"Among the many exciting prospects for the new technology of cable television which has interested my subcommittee over the years," he said, "has been the ability of the medium to serve relatively small communities which cannot receive from large metropolitan over-the-air broadcasters the attention they deserve."

He added, "I have personally felt that there is no more conflict between over-the-air stations and cable TV systems in terms of news and public affairs than there is between large metropolitan daily newspapers and community dailies and weeklies. Both serve a vital communications need."
